Writing must exemplify clarity and brevity. Analysts write primarily in the expository style, which requires them to use precise words and simple language. It cannot be stressed enough that when writing an intelligence product, the analyst must focus on clarity and structure. [Related: Could You Pass the CIA's Writing Boot Camp?]

When communicating your analysis it is imperative that you communicate in a way that is accurate, brief and clear (see page 4). Writing clear and concise products forces analysts to carefully order their thoughts and think critically, and prevents accidental or intentional misrepresentation of the facts, thus improving the final analytical product. There is no place for the analyst's opinion ...

When communicating, listen to what the other person (or people) has to say. Watch for non-verbal communication, such as body language, and their tone of voice to help you understand their message. Hold back your own opinions and ideas until you have had chance to understand the other persons point-of-view, and then plan your responses carefully to fit with the feedback you are receiving.
